The objective of the proposed study is to develop a multidisciplinary imaging and research collaboration among engineers, physicists, and medical scientists at Vanderbilt University Medical Center and the University of Tennessee, Knoxville. This integrated approach will serve to reduce the current deficiencies in multidisciplinary cancer research by significantly enhancing the capabilities of researchers, thereby leading to the creation of opportunities for cancer research for the next generation of researchers. Our aims are (1) to design, build, and test an instrument (an imaging chamber and lighting system) that will improve biomedical imaging by providing a new, more controllable source for the excitation of fluorophores, and (2) to acquire and post-process biological and medical images using this modified instrument. In this project, Vanderbilt University School of Engineering faculty and staff will research and develop the instrument. The Nuclear Medicine Physics and Medical Physics Departments at the University of Tennessee will support the instrument by developing image acquisition and post-processing software. Two imaging applications will be developed. We will test the instrument and imaging capabilities by imaging two mammalian models. The first model will be photosensitized organisms which have intracellular fluorophores expressed as a result of a specific condition in the cells. The second model will be several types of tissues from a mammalian model. For the first model, we will investigate the photochemical changes of an organism resulting from a treatment with a photosensitizing agent. The mechanism will be investigated by using different wavelengths of light to produce different chemical responses in the organism. For the second model, we will investigate the changes in blood flow and oxygenation occurring in different tissues under various conditions. Our collaborators at the University of Tennessee will develop image acquisition and post-processing software. We will demonstrate the capabilities of the proposed instrument in a variety of biomedical applications including medicine, clinical medicine, experimental research, and education. #ifndef A_I_DECL_H #define A_I_DECL_H /* * Copyright 2006 Nick Jones * All rights reserved. * * Permission is hereby granted, free of charge, to any person obtaining a * copy of this software and
